Hence, A deed or sealed agreement or contract between two or more parties, without special reference to its form.

Occasionally a word, sentence, or figure was engrossed on the space where they were divided, as in the space between a bank cheque and its counterfoil.

6. spec. (short for Index librorum prohibitorum). The list, published by authority, of books which Roman Catholics are forbidden to read, or may read only in expurgated editions.

Rules for the formation of such an Index (Regulæ Indicis) were formulated by the Council of Trent, in accordance with which an Index librorum prohibitorum (Index of prohibited books) was published by authority of Pius IV in 1564, and, with an Appendix, by Clement VIII in 1596; new editions, augmented with the names of later authors and books, have been published from time to time down to the present. This is the official 'Index'. In its current form, it is a list, not only of works entirely prohibited to the faithful, but also of works not to be read, unless or until they are corrected (nisi or donec corrigantur); in the case of the latter, the portions to be deleted or altered are sometimes indicated.

b. ‖ Index expurgatorius (Lat.), Expurgatory Index, an authoritative specification of the passages to be expunged or altered in works otherwise permitted. Also transf. and fig.

The Regulæ of the Council of Trent provided for the expurgation of such books, and in accordance therewith an Index Expurgatorius was printed at Antwerp, under the authority of Philip II, in 1571 (reprints of which are referred to in quot. 1611), another under the authority of the Inquisitor General Quiroga at Madrid in 1584 (see quot. 1625), and others with the same or similar titles in various Roman Catholic states. A bull of Sixtus V (1585–90) also authorized the Cardinals chosen to deal with prohibited books to prepare 'indices expurgatorios'. Such a work on a large scale was commenced at Rome 1607 (Bergamo 1608), with the title 'Indicis librorum expurgandorum in studiosorum gratiam confecti Tomus I., in quo 50 auctorum libri præ cæteris desiderati emendantur, per F. Jo. Mariam Brasichell., Sacri Palatii Apostol. Magistrum'. This (which never proceeded beyond the first volume) is the work referred to in quot. 1620. (See, on the whole subject, Rev. J. Mendham Account of the Indexes, both prohibitory and expurgatory, 1826, Literary Policy of the Church of Rome, 1830 and 1844). In English use, the name Index Expurgatorius has often been applied to the Index librorum prohibitorum (cf. quot. 1845), especially in transf. and fig. uses.

Indian summer. [INDIAN a. 2.]

A period of calm, dry, mild weather, with hazy atmosphere, occurring in the late autumn in the Northern United States.

(The name is generally attributed to the fact that the region in which the meteorological conditions in question were originally noticed was still occupied by the Indians; but other more specific explanations have been essayed. In its origin it appears to have had nothing to do with the glowing autumnal tints of the foliage, with which it is sometimes associated. The actual time of its occurrence and the character of the weather appear also to vary for different regions: see the quots.)

1794 E. DENNY Milit. Jrnl. (1859) 198, Oct. 13th.—Pleasant weather. The Indian summer here [near Presqu' Isle]. Frosty nights. 1804 C. B. BROWN tr. Volney's View Soil U.S. 210 A series of fine days are expected near November, which is called the Indian summer [une série de beaux jours, appelés l'été sauvage (Indian summer)]. 1812 J. FREEMAN Serm. viii. 277–8 note, Two or three weeks of fair weather, in which the air is perfectly transparent, and the clouds, which float in a sky of the purest azure, are adorned with brilliant colours. .. This charming season is called the Indian Summer, a name which is derived from the natives, who believe that it is caused by a wind, which comes immediately from the court of their great and benevolent God Cautantowwit, or the south-western God. 1817 J. BRADBURY Trav. Amer. 259 About the beginning or middle of October the Indian summer commences, and is immediately known by the change which takes place in the atmosphere, as it becomes hazy, or what they term smoky. 1824 DOMBRIDGE *Notes on Ind. AF. endite-r to indict, charge, accuse, corresponds in form to OF. enditer, -ditier, -ditter, answering to a late L. type indictāre*, f. in- (IN-2) + dictāre to say, declare, DICTATE. But the OF. verb is recorded only in the senses 'make known, indicate, dictate, suggest, compose, write, instruct, inform, prompt, incite' (Godef.), so that the history of the AF. and ME. word is not clear. A corresponding med.L. indictāre to indict, accuse, is cited by Du Cange only in English legal use, and seems to be merely the latinized form of the AF. and ME. verb, in accordance with which again the ME. endite has been altered to indite, and (since 1600) written indict, though the spoken word remains indite. See also INDITE v.

The sense of endite, indict, may have arisen from L. indicĕre 'to declare publicly', taken as in It. indicare 'to denounce' (Florio); but it comes near to a sense of L. indicāre to INDICATE, 'to give evidence against'; and it appears as if there had been, in late L. or Romanic, some confusion of the L. verbs indicāre, indicĕre, indictāre: thus in It., Florio has 'Indicare, to shew, to declare, to utter; also to endite and accuse, as Indicere'; 'Indittere, to intimate, denounce, manifest, declare; ..also to accuse, to appeach or detect'; 'Inditiare, to indite; also as Indicere'; 'Inditiore, an inditer, a denouncer; also an intimator'.]

Its essential constituent is indigo-blue; besides which, however, commercial or crude indigo contains indigo-red, indigo-brown, and some earthy glutinous matters (indigo-gluten).

b. Of speech or narration: Put in a reported form, not in the speaker's own words, but with the changes of pronouns, persons, tenses, etc. which conform it to the point of view of the reporter; oblique: opposed to DIRECT a. 6 b.

The idioms of different languages differ widely in respect to indirect construction. In English, indirect sentences are usually introduced by that, or if, expressed or understood. Thus, a speaker's actual words 'I will not go unless you use force', are reported indirectly, by the person addressed, as 'he said [that] he would not go unless I used force', by a third party as 'he told X. [that] he would not go, unless he (X.) used force'. The question 'Do you know me?' becomes, in indirect narration, 'He asked me if I knew him', and 'he asked X. if he knew him'.

1866 MASON Eng. Gram. (ed. 7) 111 In such sentences .. the dependent clauses are indirect questions. 1866 W. E. JELF Grk. Gram. (ed. 4) § 886 II. 627 Indirect interrog. sentences. 1870-7 MOULTON tr. Winer's N. T. Gram. III. § 60. 9 When words spoken by others are quoted, they are not, as a rule, brought into the structure of the sentence in the indirect construction. 1879 ROBY Lat. Gram. II. 342 When a statement, question [etc.] is reported in a form which makes it dependent in construction on some such words as said, the language is said to be oblique or indirect.

c. Indirect object (see quots.).

1879 ROBY Lat. Gram. II. 54 The indirect object is the person (or thing) affected by the occurrence of an action.. although not directly or primarily acted on. 1881 MASON Eng. Gram. (ed. 24) 149 The Indirect Object of a verb denotes that which is indirectly affected by an action, but is not the immediate object or product of it, as 'Give him the book', 'Make me a coat'.

d. Indirect passive, a passive verb having for its subject the indirect object of the active voice, as I was told it; he was refused admittance; the mayor is given power and authority (see GIVE v. 2); also, a passive voice formed on an intransitive verb construed with a preposition, the prepositional object becoming the subject of the passive verb, while the preposition becomes adverbial, as they have spoken to him, he has been spoken to; many run after her, she is much run after.

4. Not directly aimed at or attained; not immediately resulting from an action or cause.

1823 SCOTT Peveril XXXIX, He is one who will neither seek an indirect advantage by a specious road, nor take an evil path to gain a real good purpose. 1849 MACAULAY Hist. Eng. vi. II. 93 He could not bring himself to sacrifice .. his salary of eight thousand pounds a year, and the far larger indirect emoluments of his office. 1875 JOWETT Plato (ed. 2) III. 9 Happiness is not the direct aim, but the indirect consequence of the good government.

Indo-Europe·an, a. and sb. [f. Indo- 1 + European.]

A. adj. Common to India and Europe; applied to the great family or class of cognate languages (also called Indo-Germanic and Aryan, q.v.)

spoken over the greater part of Europe and extending into Asia as far as northern India, and to the race or its divisions characterized by the use of one or other of these languages.

The earliest name for this family of languages, and, both from priority of date and superior fitness of expression, having greater claims than INDO-GERMANIC.

1814 [DR. T. YOUNG] in Q. Rev. X. 255 (Adelung's Mithridates) Another ancient and extensive class of languages, united by a greater number of resemblances than can well be altogether accidental, may be denominated the Indo-european, comprehending the Indian, the West Asiatic, and almost all the European languages. Ibid. 256 Classes and Families .. II. Indoeuropean: Sanscrit, Median, Arabian, Greek, German, Celtic, Latin, Cantabrian, Sclavic. 1815 [DR. T. D. WHITAKER] Ibid. XIV. 97 (Hermes Scythicus) Of the five classes which we denominated Monosyllabic, Indoeuropean, Tataric, African, and American, the first two only are to be considered as constituted according to correct philological principles. 1826 PRICHARD Phys. Hist. Mankind v. i. 491 By some the term of Indo-European, by others that of Indo-German dialects, has been applied to the whole class of idioms which are found to be thus allied. The former of these terms is preferable to the latter, and indeed to any other, as being the most general. 1831 — Eastern Origin Celtic Nat. 20 Adelung and Murray have regarded the Celtic as a branch of the Indo-European stock. 1841 LATHAM Eng. Lang. i. 3 That the Celtic languages were Indo-European has lately been demonstrated by Dr. Prichard. 1871 MORRIS *Hist. Outl. Eng. b. Pertaining or belonging to the Indo-European family of languages or peoples, as Indo-European root, philology, culture, etc.

B. sb. 1. A member of the Indo-European race; an Aryan.

Indogæan (indodʒī·ăn, -gē·ăn), a. [f. mod.L. Indogæa, f. INDO-[1] + Gr. γαῖα the earth + -AN.] Of or pertaining to Indogæa, the zoological region (also called Indian) comprising India, China, the Eastern Peninsula, and the Indo-malayan archipelago, as far as Wallace's line.

Indogen (i·ndodʒen). Chem. [f. INDO-[2] + -GEN 1.] A name for the group $C_6H_4\langle^{CO}_{NH}\rangle C=$ the double molecule of which (di-indogen) constitutes indigo-blue. Hence Indoge·nic a. in I. acid = Indoxylic acid. Indo·genide, a compound of indogen with another radical, as indogenide of benzoic aldehyde, or of pyruric acid. I·ndo-Germa·nic, a. [f. INDO-[1] + GERMANIC, ad. Ger. indogermanisch.] = INDO-EUROPEAN a., ARYAN a.

('Indo-Germanic' is a term of later introduction than 'Indo-European', and of German origin, appearing first, so far as yet traced (see Gustav Meyer in Indoger. Forschungen II. 125–130), in Klaproth Asia Polyglotta, 1823. With Klaproth it seems to have been a kind of abbreviation of the expression (used by him in an earlier work) 'die grosse Indisch-Medisch-Sclavisch-Germanische Völkerkette, die vom Ganges bis zu den Britannischen Inseln reicht', naming the two extreme members of the ethnological 'chain'. When Celtic was shown to be a still more extreme member of the same series, 'indogermanisch' lost its appropriateness, and some scholars tried to substitute indokeltisch, 'Indo-Celtic', in Fr. indo-celtique, while others, as Bopp in his Vergleichende Grammatik, gave preference to the more comprehensive indoeuropäisch, the equivalents to which, INDO-EUROPEAN, indo-européen, were also favoured in Great Britain and France. But the employment of 'indogermanisch' on the title-page of Pott's Etymologische Forschungen auf dem Gebiete der indogermanischen Sprachen (1833–36) popularized this term in Germany, whence under the influence of German textbooks, or of teachers trained in Germany, it has come into English use, and is now probably more used than 'Indo-European'.)

1835 [DR. ROSEN] in Q. Jrnl. Educ. Apr. 332 (Review of Pott), The family of the Indo-Germanic languages may, according to Mr. Pott, be divided into five branches. 1839 Penny Cycl. XIII. 308/2 The following table taken from Pott's Etymologische Forschungen contains a list of the principal transformations of letters in some of the Indo-Germanic languages. 1848 LATHAM *Eng. 10. Electr. and Magnetism. The action of inducing or bringing about an electric or magnetic state in a body by the proximity (without actual contact) of an electrified or magnetized body.

The terms induce and induction were originally employed apparently to avoid the use of terms involving any theory of the nature of the action involved. The medium of communication is now held to be, as in the case of other forms of energy, the intervening ether.

Electrodynamic or voltaic induction, the production of an electric current (induced current) by the influence of another independent electric current. Electromagnetic induction, the production of a state of magnetic polarity in a body near or round which an electric or galvanic current passes, or the generation of an electric current by the action of a magnet (the latter called by Faraday, more properly, magneto-electric induction). Electrostatic induction, the production of an electrical charge upon a body by the influence of a neighbouring body charged with statical electricity, as exemplified in Volta's electrophorus. Magnetic induction, the production of magnetic properties in iron or other substances when placed in a magnetic field, as when a bar of soft iron is magnetized by a neighbouring magnet. Mutual induction, the reaction of two electric circuits upon each other; self-induction, the reaction of different parts of the same circuit upon one another.

Researches* § 1 in Phil. Trans. 125 The power which electricity of tension possesses of causing an opposite electrical state in its vicinity has been expressed by the general term Induction; which, as it has been received into scientific language, may also with propriety be used in the same general sense to express the power which electric currents may possess of inducing any particular state upon matter in their immediate neighbourhood. Ibid. § 58. 139. I propose to call the agency thus exerted by ordinary magnets, magneto-electric or magnetelectric induction. § 59 The only difference which powerfully strikes the attention as existing between volta-electric and magneto-electric induction, is the suddenness of the former, and the sensible time required by the latter. 1870 TYNDALL Lect. Electr. 14 This forcible separation of the two fluids of a neutral conductor, by the mere proximity of an electrified body, is called electric induction. Bodies in this state are also said to be electrified by influence. 1892 S. P. THOMPSON Dynamo-Elect. Mach. (ed. 4) 83 We know that every electric current possesses a property sometimes called 'electric inertia', sometimes called 'self-induction', by virtue of which it tends to go on, and that it is in the current's own magnetic field that this inertia of self-induction resides. Ibid. 102 Mutual induction between adjacent parts is of enormous importance in alternate current machines.

1892 MORLEY & MUIR Dict. Chem. III. 8/1 When H and Cl are mixed in equal volumes and exposed to sunlight, a measurable time elapses before chemical change begins. Bunsen and Roscoe, who examined this phenomenon, regard the mixture as resisting chemical change, and they used the term induction to express the gradual overcoming of this resistance. The term has also been used by Wright, who noticed a similar phenomenon in the reduction of metallic oxides by CO and H.

IN with an inorganic e, and as a weakened or simplified form of INNE; there are difficulties, historical or phonetic, in either view, though the latter is perhaps the less objectionable. Ine and ine are found side by side in the Lambeth Homilies.]

-ine, suffix 1, forming adjs., repr. L. -īnus, -īna, -īnum, added to names of persons, animals, or material things, and to some other words, with the sense 'of' or 'pertaining to', 'of the nature of', represented in Fr. by -in masc., -ine fem., in Eng. now usually by -ine, formerly and still exceptionally by -in. Examples are L. adulterīnus adulterine, anserīnus anserine, asinīnus asinine, canīnus canine, divīnus divine, femininus feminine, genuīnus genuine, libertīnus libertine, marinus marine, masculīnus masculine, supīnus supine; in some cases with blending of a previous suffix, as clandestīnus clandestine, intestīnus intestine, mātūtīnus matutine, vespertīnus vespertine. Also from proper names, as Alpīnus Alpine, Capitōlīnus Capitoline, Latīnus Latin (formerly Latine), Sāturnīnus Saturnine, Tarentīnus Tarentine. On the pattern of these, adjs. have continued to be freely formed in the Romanic langs. and in English, as in Algerine, Caroline, Florentine, Socotrine; and the termination is now greatly used in Natural History, in forming adjs., with or without L. type, on the names of genera, as acarine, accipitrine, bovine, caprine, equine, feline, hystricine, murine, passerine. In these Natural History adjs. the pronunciation is (-əin), usually unstressed; but in other words it is very various, depending upon the length of time the word has been in English, the channel through which it came, the place of the stress, and other circumstances: cf. divine, supine (-əi·n), marine (-ī·n), feminine, genuine (-in), aquiline, bovine, leonine, alkaline (-əin), and see the history of the individual words.

-ine, suffix 2, forming adjs., repr. L. -īnus, a. Gr. -ινος, from names of minerals, plants, etc., or (in a few words) of L. origin, having, in Romanic and Eng., the same sense and the same forms, as -INE 1; as adamantin-us adamantine, amethystinus amethystine, corallinus coralline, crystallinus crystalline, hyacinthinus hyacinthine, pristinus pristine. The etymological and historical pronunciation is (-in), e.g. (pri·stin), (ædàmæntin); but, from the spelling -ine, and the attraction of words in -INE 1, there is now a strong tendency to lengthen the i in crystalline (-əin), etc.

-ine, suffix 3, forming sbs., repr. F. -ine, L. -īna, Gr. -ινη, forming feminine titles, as in Gr. ἡρωινη, L. hērōïna, F. héroïne heroine. With this the Ger. landgrāfin, markgrāfin, Du. landgravin, markgravin (the suffix of which is orig. the same as -EN 2 1), have fallen together in French and in Eng., as landgravine, margravine.

-ine, suffix [4], forming sbs., repr. F. -ine (-in), L. -īna (-inus), in origin identical with -INE [1]. In L., -īna formed feminine abstracts from verbs, as rapīna rapine, ruīna ruin, and from agent-nouns, as disciplīna discipline, doctrīna doctrine, medicīna medicine; also sbs. from other sources, as fascīna fascine, resīna resin, ūrīna urine. The adjs. in -īnus, -īna were also used subst., as in concubīnus, -īna concubine, lupīnus lupine, and esp. in proper names, as Antōnīnus Antonine, Augustīnus Augustine, Constāntīnus Constantine, Crispīnus Crispin, Justīnus Justin, Agrippīna, Constantīna, etc. The English form of those in -īna (through Fr., or on the Fr. type) is -ine, occasionally in early words reduced to -in; those in -īnus give F. and Eng. -in, but in Eng. often -ine.

Formations of this type were multiplied in late L. and Romanic, e.g. famīna famine, F. routine; in Romanic this suffix (It., Sp. -ino, -ina, F. -in, -ine) is greatly used in forming names of derived substances, similative appellations, diminutives, etc. Many of these have come into English, in the F. form -ine (-ēn), which has consequently become a formative element, freely used in forming the names of derivative products, and of things supposed to be derived from, resemble, imitate, or commemorate those from which they are named, and thus in the trade-names of new varieties of fabrics, cosmetics, patent medicines, and proprietary articles generally, e.g. dentine, osseine, nectarine, brilliantine, grenadine, albertine, victorine, etc. Feminine personal names of Romanic origin in -ina sometimes retain that form, but often take -ine (-in or -ēn) after Fr., as Caroline, Catherine, Ernestine, Josephine.

-ine, suffix [5], Chem., in origin an offshoot of -INE [4], as occurring in the names of some derived substances: see GELATIN, -INE. At first used unsystematically in forming names of extractive principles and chemical derivatives of various kinds; also, in the English names given early in the 19th century to the four elements chlorine, fluorine, iodine, bromine (in F. chlore, fluor, iode, brome). In all these, but especially in the names of extractive principles, the ending -ine was by some reduced to -in, thus gelatine or gelatin, aconitine or aconitin, chlorine or chlorin. In recent systematic nomenclature the two forms have been differentiated, -ine being now used (1) in forming names of alkaloids and basic substances, as aconitine, cocaïne, nicotine, strychnine, etc., which are thus distinguished from names of neutral substances, proteids, etc., in -in (see -IN [1]); and (2) in Hofmann's systematic names of hydrocarbons of the form C_nH_{2n-2}, as ethine or acetylene, C_2H_2, propine or allylene, C_3H_4, etc. These latter are not much used. In the names of the elements, and some other substances, not belonging to any of the classes named, -ine is retained (though chlorin, fluorin, etc., appear in some American books). In popular and commercial use, the ending -ine is still current in the names of some substances for which systematic nomenclature requires -in: see -IN [1].

-ine has been used by some authors to form the names of minerals; but in later systematic use, esp. by Dana, this is changed, in names of species, into -ite; thus chalcosine, erythrine, in Dana chalcocite, erythrite.

4. Astron. A deviation from uniformity in the motion of a heavenly body.

The older astronomers reckoned four inequalities, two common to planets and the moon, and two confined to the moon. First Inequality: that which is due to the eccentricity of the orbit, and the acceleration of motion at a planet's perihelion or the moon's perigee. Second Inequality: that which arises from the obliquity of the direction of the planet's motion to the radius vector of its orbit; = Evection. Third Inequality: = Variation (of the moon). Fourth Inequality: that due to the more rapid motion of the moon when the earth is in perihelion; also called Annual Inequality or Annual Equation. Later astronomers have discovered several others, as Parallactic Inequality (see quot. 1857-76); Periodic Inequality, the comparatively short recurring orbital perturbation due to the attraction of another body, as the great inequality of Jupiter and Saturn.

1690 Leybourn Curs. Math. 758 The second Inequality of the Moon is explained by a little Circle. 1726 tr. Gregory's Astron. I. 427 By any single observation of a Planet .. to clear it of its Second Inequality, and find its Distance from the Sun. 1728 Pemberton Newton's Philos. 228 Sir Isaac Newton has computed the very quantity of many of the moon's inequalities. 1816 Playfair *Nat. (ed. 3) 80 The Variation .. was the first lunar inequality explained by Sir I. Newton on the theory of gravitation. Ibid., The Parallactic Inequality arises from the sensible difference in the disturbing influence exerted by the Sun on the Moon, according as the latter is in that part of its orbit nearest to, or most removed from, the Sun. Ibid., The Secular Acceleration of the Moon's mean motion .. This inequality was detected by Halley in 1693. Ibid. 81 Hansen elucidated, a few years ago, two other inequalities in the Moon's motion, due, the one directly and the other indirectly, to the influence of Venus.

5. Math. a. The relation between quantities that are unequal in value or magnitude. Sign of inequality, either of the signs > ('is greater than') and < ('is less than'). b. An expression of this relation, consisting of two unequal quantities connected by either of these signs: distinguished from equation.

Inference (i·nfĕrĕns). [ad. med.L. inferentia (Abelard Ouvr. inéd. ed. Cousin, 325, 328) (cf. It. inferenza 'an inference, an implying', Florio 1611), f. inferent-em, pr. pple. of inferre to INFER: used instead of cl.L. illātio.]

1. The action or process of inferring; the drawing of a conclusion from known or assumed facts or statements; esp. in Logic, the forming of a conclusion from data or premisses, either by inductive or deductive methods; reasoning from something known or assumed to something else which follows from it; = ILLATION. Also (with pl.), a particular act of inferring; the logical form in which this is expressed.

In English, the word appears first in the general sense, not as a term of formal Logic. In Logical treatises, it is found first applied to the deductive process of the syllogism, and its conclusion (mediate inference); its application to the inferring of a conclusion from a single proposition by conversion, opposition, permutation, or the like (immediate inference), and its use in the logic of induction (inductive inference) appear later, and are not accepted by all logicians. On the other hand, some restrict the term to induction, and deny that either a syllogism or an immediate inference can properly be called an inference.

Prodigal* III. ii, 'Tis merely unsound unprofitable idle inference. 1643 MILTON Divorce II. ix, 'Therefore shall a man cleave to his wife'..which we see is no absolute command, but with an inference, Therefore. 1736 BUTLER Analogy II. vi. 308 Religion is..a matter of deduction and inference. 1803 LD. App. 255 There are various Immediate Inferences of one proposition from another..The first of these is Conversion. 1843 MILL Logic II. i. § 3 Cases of inference in the proper acceptation of the term, those in which we set out from known truths, to arrive at others really distinct from them. Ibid. IV. i. § 2 In almost every act of our perceiving faculties, observation and inference are intimately blended. 1864 BOWEN Logic vi. 148 Inference or Reasoning is that act of Pure Thought whereby one Judgment is derived from another, or from two others. 1866 FOWLER Deduct. Logic III. i. (1869) 70 In any inference, we argue either to something already implied in the premisses or not: if the latter, the inference is inductive, if the former deductive. If the deductive inference contain only a single premiss, it is immediate; if it contain two premisses, and the conclusion be drawn from these jointly, it is mediate, and is called a syllogism. 1874 STUBBS Const. Hist. I. i. 2 This..is not a matter of inference. It is a recorded fact of history.

Infinitary (infi·nitări), a. Math. [= Ger. infinitär, as in infinitärkalkul 'infinitary calculus' (Du Bois Raymond): see -ARY[1].] Relating to infinity, or to an infinite value of a quantity; as infinitary property of a function, i. e. one which the function has when the variable becomes infinite.

Infinitate (infi·nitēit), v. [f. ppl. stem of Schol.L. infinitāre (Abelard Dialectica, Wks., Paris 1836, 225), f. infinit-us INFINITE: see -ATE[3].] trans. To render infinite; in Logic, to make (a positive concept, term, or predicate) 'infinite' (see INFINITE a. 8) or indefinite in extent, by prefixing a negative. Infinitation (infinitēi·ʃən). Logic. [ad. Schol. L. infinitātio (Abelard Dialectica 225), n. of action from infinitāre: see prec.] The action of infinitating or making 'infinite'; the condition of being infinitated; hence, applied to one of the forms of immediate inference, also called permutation or obversion, in which one term, usually the predicate, of the original proposition is made negative.

Infinite (i·nfinit), a. (adv.) and sb. Forms: 4-6 infynyt(e, 4-7 infinit, (5 infenite, 6 infinyte, infynit(e, Sc. infineit), 4- infinite. [ad. L. infinīt-us unbounded, unlimited, f. in- (IN-[3])

A. adj.

1. Gram. The name of that form of a verb which expresses simply the notion of the verb without predicating it of any subject. Usually classed as a 'mood', though strictly a substantive with certain verbal functions, esp. those of governing an object, and being qualified by an adverb.

(Called by Quintilian and Priscian infinitus modus, by Diomedes infinitivus 'because it has not definite persons and numbers, whence it has also been called by some, impersonativus and insignativus'. In the short grammar of Dionysius Thrax (B.C. 80), it is called ἀπαρέμφατος, i.e. without modification of sense, unmodified.)

In modern Eng., the infinitive has the simple uninflected form of the verb; agreeing in this respect with the imperative, and (except in the verb be) with the first pers. sing., and the whole plural, of the present indicative. In OE., the infinitive had (in the nom.-acc. case) the suffix -an, ME. -en, -e; it had also a dative form in -anne, ME., -enne, -ene, -en, -e. The latter is sometimes fancifully called by modern grammarians, the gerundial or gerundive infinitive, as answering in some of its functions to the Latin gerund or gerundive. (It answers more to the L. supine.) The OE. nom.-acc. infinitive is the source of the (now less frequent) simple infinitive, as in 'we saw him come', 'they need not come'. The dative-infinitive is formally the source of the infinitive with to, and functionally the origin of this in such uses as 'he went to see the fight' ('infinitive of purpose'), 'it was easy to see' ('adjectival infinitive'); but to is now prefixed also to the nom.-acc. infinitive, where OE. had the simple form in -an, as in 'to see is to believe', 'he likes to see it'. See To prep.

Influenza (influe·nzä). [a. It. influenza, lit. 'influence':—med.L. influentia: see INFLUENCE.

It. influenza has the various senses of Eng. influence; but has, besides, developed (app. from the notion of 'astral' or 'occult influence') that of 'visitation' or 'outbreak' of any epidemic disease which assails many people at the same time and place (e.g. influenza di catarro, influenza di febbre scarlattina), a sense known as early as 1504; hence, absolutely, 'an epidemic'; in 1743 applied specifically to 'the epidemic' (called also la grippe) which then raged in Italy, and spread over Europe generally, and for which the Italian word (anglicized in pronunciation) became the English specific name.]

A specific febrile zymotic disorder, highly contagious, and occurring for the most part in widespread epidemics. Its symptoms and sequelæ are extremely variable, but generally include rapid prostration and severe catarrh. The mortality is not high in proportion to the numbers attacked.

The term has been also applied loosely to any severe catarrh of the respiratory mucous membrane, esp. to a 'cold in the head' with running at the nose, sometimes called an influenza-cold. This use was frequent in the interval between the epidemic of 1847-8, and that which began in 1889, during which period no true influenza visited Great Britain.

Infourme, infowrme, obs. ff. Inform v.

Infra- (i·nfrā), prefix, repr. L. infrā adv. and prep. 'below, underneath, beneath' (in med.L. also 'within'), used in numerous recent formations, chiefly adjectival.

This use of infra- is scarcely a Latin one, though infrāfŏrānus 'situated beneath the forum' occurs in an inscription (Lewis and Short), and infrāmūrāneus 'lying within the walls' in Gregory of Tours (Du Cange). Its recent employment is after the analogy of other prepositions; it is regularly opposed to supra-, sometimes to super-: the second element ought strictly to be one of Latin origin; but it is not always so.

A. In prepositional relation to the sb. represented in second element.

1. Denoting 'below', 'beneath' (i.e. 'lower down than') in respect of local situation or position. Chiefly in terms which are the adjectival representatives of phrases in which L. infrā would be followed by a sb. in the accusative, e.g. infra-axillary 'that is infrā axillam, below the axilla or axil'; infra-mammary, 'that is infrā mammās, below the breasts'. The majority of these are anatomical terms. In a few cases the second element appears to be a sb., as infraclavicle. More rarely infra- is simply prefixed to an adj., as inframedian, infra-red.

2. Denoting 'below', 'beneath' in respect of status or condition, as infrabestial 'lower than bestial', 'beneath the brutes'. In these, infra- seems to be directly prefixed to an adjective.

3. Denoting 'within' (as in med.L.), as inframercurial, -territorial (see these words below): here the formation is as in 1.

B. In attributive or adverbial relation to the second element: 'lower', 'inferior', 'under-', as infraconstrictor, infraposition, etc.

Such compounds can be formed at will when required; the following are the principal ones in use. For the etymology of the second element see the simple words Axillary, Bestial, Cortical, etc.

In most of these compounds, practice varies as to the use of the hyphen; the hyphen is usual when the compound is new, or more or less of a nonce-word, e.g. infra-red, infra-human, infra-natural; but it is usually omitted in recognized terms, as inframaxillary, infrascapular, except when the following element begins with a vowel, as in infra-axillary, infra-inguinal, infra-orbital. It may however be used for the nonce, whenever emphasis is placed either on the prefix, or on the composite character of the word.

Infralapsarian (i·nfrălapsē·riăn), sb. and a. Theol. [f. L. infra under, beneath + laps-us fall + -arian, as in Trinitarian, etc.]

A. sb. A term applied in the 17th c. to Calvinists holding the view that God's election of some to everlasting life was consequent to his prescience of the Fall of man, or that it contemplated man as already fallen, and was thus a remedial measure: opposed to Supralapsarian.

The Supralapsarian view makes Predestination anterior or logically superior to the Fall, and views the creation, fall, and saving of some, as parts of God's eternal purpose. Infralapsarian is generally used as synonymous with Sublapsarian, the earlier and, in English writers, the more usual term. But some distinguish the two, associating Sublapsarian with the view that the Fall was foreseen, and Infralapsarian with the view that it was permitted, by God.

1731 in Bailey vol. II. 1756 in Broughton Hist. Dict. of Relig. 1775 Ash, Infralapsarian s., one who holds that God in the decree of election considered his people as fallen in Adam; a sublapsarian. 1843 J. B. Robertson tr. Moehler's Symbolism II. 345 The parties of Supralapsarians and Infralapsarians already stood opposed to each other. 1865 W. G. T. Shedd Christ. Doctrine II. 192 According to the Infra-lapsarians, the decree to create men, and that they shall apostatize, are prior to that of election and reprobation. Election supposes apostasy as a fact.

B. adj. Of or pertaining to the Infralapsarians or their doctrine.

1775 Ash, Infralapsarian adj., Belonging to the scheme or doctrine of the Infralapsarians. 1860 Gardiner Faiths of World II. 1335/1 Hagenbach alleges that the synod of Dort approved of the Infralapsarian scheme. 1865 W. G. T. Shedd Christ. Doctrine II. 192 Beza .. had adopted the supra-lapsarian statement of the doctrine of predestination, which renders the doctrine more austere and repelling than the infra-lapsarian representation.

Hence Infralapsa·rianism, the doctrine of Infralapsarians.

1847 Buch tr. Hagenbach's Hist. Doct. II. 255. 1865 W. G. T. Shedd Christ. Doctrine II. 193 The Synod of Dort favoured Infra-lapsarianism, in opposition to Gomar, who endeavoured to commit the Synod to Supra-lapsarianism.

‖ Infusoria (infiusō·riă), sb. pl. [Neuter pl. (sc. animalcula) of mod.L. infūsōrius INFUSORY; in Ger. infusorien, F. infusoires: the name animalcula infusoria was first used by Ledermuller of Nürnberg, 1760–63.]

A class of Protozoa, comprising ciliated, tentaculate, and flagellate animalcula, essentially unicellular, free-swimming, or sedentary; so called because found in infusions of decaying animal or vegetable matter.

Originally, as constituted by O. F. Müller, the Infusoria comprehended an assemblage of minute, usually microscopic, organisms, of many diverse kinds, including some now classed as vegetables, as the Diatomaceæ and the Desmidiaceæ. As now limited, the Infusoria are Protozoa characterized by a half-liquid endosarc, a firm cortical ectosarc, an outer membraneous cuticle, a mouth and anus, and a contractile vesicle which injects fluid. They were regarded by Huxley as a primary group in the animal kingdom.

-ing[1], suffix forming verbal derivatives, originally abstract nouns of action, but subsequently developed in various directions: OE. -ung, -ing = OFris. -unge, -enge, -inge, OS. -unga (MLG. and MDu. -inge, Du. -ing), OHG. -unga, -ung (MHG. -unge, Ger. -ung), ON. -ung and -ing; not known in Gothic:—OTeut. type -ungō* (and ? -ingō*) str. fem.; not identified outside Teutonic. In OE. the more usual form was -ung (inflected -unge), but -ing also was frequent, esp. in derivatives from original ja- verbs (see Cosijn, Altwests. Gramm. II. 21, 22). In early ME., -ung rapidly died out, being scarcely found after 1250, and -ing (in early ME. -inge) became the regular form. In later ME., -yng was a frequent scribal variant.

1. The original function of the suffix was to form nouns of action; as ácsung ASKING, from ácsian to ask, bliding, bodung preaching, BODING, cēapung, -ing CHEAPING, cliding, -ung CHIDING, crēopung CREEPING, ębbung EBBING, fēding FEEDING, gaderung GATHERING. These substantives were originally abstract; but even in OE. they often came to express a completed action, a process, habit, or art, as hlętsung, -ing BLESSING, leornung LEARNING, tīdung TIDINGS, weddung betrothal, WEDDING, and then admitted a plural; sometimes they became concrete, as in bedding, eardung dwelling, offrung OFFERING, rynning rennet, EARNING 3. During the ME. period all these uses received greater development, and in the 14th c. the formation became established, esp. in the gerundial use (see 2 below), as an actual or possible derivative of every verb. By later extension, formations of the same kind have been analogically made from substantives (see c, g, below), and, by ellipsis, from adverbs, as innings, offing, outing, homing (homecoming); while nonce-words in -ing are formed freely on words or phrases of many kinds, e.g. oh-ing, hear-hearing, hoo-hooing, pshawing, yo hoing (calling oh!, hear! hear!, etc.), how-d'ye-doing (saying 'how do you do?'); 'I do not believe in all this pinting' (having pints of beer).

In current use, verbal substantives in -ing may be grouped, as to their sense, under the following heads:

a. Nouns of continuous action or existence, as crying, falling, flying, kicking, living, pushing, running, sleeping, speaking, striking, etc. They are distinguished from verbal sbs. of the same form as the verb-stem, as a cry, a fall, a kick, a push, a run, a shout, a sleep, etc., in that the latter denote acts of momentary or short duration, having a definite beginning and end, and grammatically take a and plural, while the sbs. in -ing imply indefinite duration without reference to beginning or end, and take no plural. Cf. 'a loud cry', 'many repeated cries', with 'loud and continued crying'. A push is done at once, but may be repeated as many pushes; pushing is continuous, there may be 'much', but not 'many' of it.

b. The notion of action may be limited to that of a single or particular occasion, as a christening, a wedding, a meeting, a sitting, a merry-making, an outing. As thus used, the sb. takes a plural: 'three long sittings'.

c. The notion of simple action passes insensibly into that of a process, practice, habit, or art, which may or may not be regarded as in actual exercise; e.g. 'reading and writing are now common acquirements'; so drawing, engraving, fencing, smoking, swimming. Words of this kind are also formed directly from sbs. which are the names of things used, or persons engaged, in the action: such are ballooning, blackberrying, canalling, chambering, cocking (cock-fighting), fowling, gardening, hopping (hop-picking), hurting (gathering hurts), mooning, nutting, sniping, buccaneering, costering, soldiering, and the like.

d. Hence often transferred to the concrete or material accompaniment or product of the action or process, as 'the paper was covered with writing'; so binding, blacking, dripping, dubbing, lightning, sewing, stitching, etc.

e. Hence as the designation of a material thing in which the action or its result is concreted or embodied; as 'a writing was affixed to the wall'; so a covering, holding, landing, shaving, winding (of a river), etc. A peculiar instance is a being, one wherein the attribute of being or existence is exemplified, now usually a living being.

f. Often used as the collective designation of the substance or material employed in an action or process, as clothing, that with which one is clothed; so bedding, carpeting, ceiling, edging, flooring, gearing, gilding, housing, lining, rigging, roofing, shipping, tackling, tiling, trimming, etc.

g. In the preceding group, there is often a sb. of the same form as the verb, with which the noun in -ing comes to be closely associated, as in bed, bedding; clothes, clothing; floor, flooring; rail, railing; ship, shipping, etc. Hence arise formations in -ing from substantives without a corresponding verb; esp. in industrial and commercial language, with the sense of a collection or indefinite mass of the thing or of its material; as ashlaring, coping, cornicing, costering, girdering, piping, scaffolding, tubing; bagging, quilting, sacking, sheeting, shirting, ticking, transering.

h. In some words the concrete sense appears exclusively, or preferentially, in the plural -ings: e.g. earnings, leavings, sweepings, tidings; hangings, innings, moorings, trappings.

Other exceptional or irregular uses of -ing are discussed under the individual words.

The vbl. sb. in -ing often forms the second element in a compound. The first element may be a qualifying adv. which in the finite tenses of the vb. formerly stood either before or after it, but in the vbl. sbs. and adjs. regularly preceded, and thus came to be united with these: thus, from out go or go out came out going, now out-going or outgoing. So down-sitting, in-being, in-dwelling, off-scouring, up-rising, well-being. The first element may also be a sb., the direct, indirect, or adverbial object of the verb, as book-keeping, child-bearing, glass-blowing, house-keeping, sheep-shearing, sea-faring, hand-writing, type-writing, or merely = a subjective genitive, as cock-crowing, sun-rising.

The vbl. sb. often stands in an attributive relation to another sb., as in the building trade = the trade of building, drawing materials = materials for drawing, singing lessons = lessons in singing; when such expressions form established designations, they are regularly hyphened, and pronounced with the stress on the first element, as in breeding-place, carving-knife, dancing-master, dwelling-house, fowling-piece, laughing-stock, meeting-house, reaping-hook, stumbling-block, spinning-wheel, thanksgiving-day, turning-lathe, walking-stick, etc. But, when the collocation is only occasional, and the vbl. sb. stands in a simple attributive relation to the following sb., it approaches in function to an adjective, and is liable to be confounded with the pres. pple. (-ING[2]) used adjectivally. The sense generally determines the nature of the collocation; thus, drawing lessons are not lessons that draw, but lessons in drawing; a fainting fit, not a fit that faints, but a fit of fainting; a drinking cup, not a cup that drinks, but a cup for drinking with. A walking-leaf is a leaf so-called) that walks; a walking-stick is a stick for walking. But in some cases in which the second element denotes a machine, agency, or agent, it is difficult to say whether the word in -ing is the vbl. sb. used attributively, or the present pple. used adjectivally, e.g. a cutting tool, a bursting charge, an advertising agency. In accordance with general analogy, such combinations are, as a rule, treated in this dictionary as attrib. uses of the vbl. sb.

2. The most notable development of the vbl. sb. in -ing is its use as a gerund, i.e. a substantive with certain verbal functions, particularly those of being qualified by an adverb instead of an adjective, and of governing an object like a verb: e.g. the habit of speaking loosely (= loose speaking); he has hopes of coming back speedily (= a speedy return); he practises writing (= the writing of) leading articles; engaged in building himself a house (= the building of a house for himself); after having written a letter (= the completion of the writing of a letter).

This gerundial use is peculiar to English, of which it is a characteristic and most important feature; it was unknown to OE. and early ME.

The first traces of it as yet pointed out (see R. Blume Ursprung und Entwickelung des Gerundiums im Englischen, Bremen 1880) occur c 1340 in the Ayenbite of Inwit and in the writings of Richard Rolle of Hampole, in the separation of the adv. in downcoming, downfalling, ingoing, etc., and the placing of it after the vbl. sb., coming down, falling down, going in, as in the finite verb, come down, fall down, go in. This was soon extended to adverbs and adverbial phrases generally, so that it became established that any vbl. sb. could, like the vb. to which it belonged, take an adverbial qualification. In other respects the vbl. sb. at first retained its sb. construction, e.g. c 1350 HAMPOLE Prose Tr. (E. E. T. S.) 11 'all manere of withdraweynge of oþer men thynges wrangwysely agaynes haire wyll þat aghte it'.

A generation later, the vbl. sb. is found with a verbal regimen, thus 1377 LANGLAND P. Pl. B. XIV. 186 'Confessioun and knowlechyng and crauyng þy mercy Shulde amende vs'; Ibid. XIX. 72 'with-outen mercy askynge'. This gerundial construction is very frequent in Wyclif's Bible (1382); and it is significant that he regularly uses it in translating the Latin gerund, while he retains the original substantival construction in rendering a Latin n. of action. Thus, Exod. xix. 1 'the thridde moneth of the goyng of Yrael out [egressionis] of the loond of Egipte'; but Hebr. xii. 10 'in receyuynge [recipiendo] the halowing of him'; Mark iii. 15 'power of heelynge [curandi] sikenesis, and of castynge out [ejiciendi] fendis'. Imitation of the L. gerund was thus app. an influential factor in the development of the Eng. gerundial use of the vbl. sb. Another influence may have been the literal rendering of the Fr. gerund (identical in form with the pr. pple.) after en, as in en venant, L. in veniendo, in coming.

The full development of the gerundial use before 1400 led necessarily to an indefinite increase of vbl. sbs. in -ing, since every verb now had one as an actual or potential dependant. In conjunction with the formal identity of gerund and pres. pple. (see -ING[2]), it led also, at a later date, to the introduction of gerundial expressions for the perfect and future tenses, and for the passive voice, coinciding in form with the ppples. of the same tenses and voices. Thus SIDNEY Arcadia I. (1725) 68 'want of consideration in not having demanded thus much'; SPENSER F. Q. III. iv. 50 'feare of being fowly shent'; HOOKER Eccl. Pol. I. xi. § 2 'by being unto God united'; SHAKS. Two Gent. I. iii. 16 'in hauing knowne no trauaile in his youth'; Tempest III. i. 19 ''T will weepe for hauing wearied you'; Mod. 'The news of his being about to return home, instead of having been slain by the enemy'.

But, although the gerundial use was fully established by 1400, it was a long time before it was distinctly separated from the earlier substantival use. The vbl. sb. has the (or equivalent) before it, and of (or equivalent) after it; the gerund has neither. A good example of the two constructions side by side, and with identical sense, occurs in Bacon's third Essay: 'Concerning the Meanes of procuring Unity: Men must beware, that in the procuring .. of Religious Unity, they doe not', etc. But, down to the 17th c., mixed constructions were frequent, in which the word in -ing had an adjectival qualification with a verbal regimen, or, conversely, an adverbial qualification with the construction of a sb. followed by of: thus SIDNEY Arcadia I. iv. 15 b, 'to fall to a sodain straitning them'; Ibid. I. xii. 56 b, 'by the well choosing of your commandements'.

The gerund still retains one feature of the vbl. sb., viz. that of admitting of a preceding possessive case or possessive pronoun, as in 'after John's behaving so strangely', 'upon my readily granting it'. In the literary language this construction is regularly retained with a pronoun, and very generally with a single personal substantive; but, with names of things, and phraseological or involved denominations, the sign of the possessive began to be dropped already by 1600; thus SHAKS. Macbeth I. iii. 44 'By each at once her choppie finger laying Vpon her skinnie lips'. No other treatment is now possible in such constructions as 'in default of one or other being accepted', 'on the general and his staff appearing', 'in the event of your expectations not being at once realized', 'in consequence of much snow having fallen'; and, in current spoken English, the 's is commonly omitted with all nouns: thus THACKERAY Van. Fair xi. P 48 'I insist upon Miss Sharp appearing', where 'Miss Sharp's' would now sound pedantic or archaic. Even a pronoun standing before the gerund is put in the objective, in dialect speech; and, when the pronoun is emphatic, this is common in ordinary colloquial English; thus THACKERAY Esmond I. 242 'Papa did not care about them learning'; — Newcomes 'But who ever heard of them eating an owl?' CHAS. READE Hard Cash (1863) II. 332 'That is no excuse for him beating you.' Sb 'What is the use of me speaking?'

In such constructions the objective sb. or pronoun seems to stand in simple apposition to the gerund, the two forming a kind of combined object of the preposition, reminding us of the Greek infinitive with an accusative after a prep., as in μετὰ τὸ παραδοθῆναι τὸν Ἰωάννην, 'after John being delivered up'. But in Eng. there has probably been analogical influence from the construction of the pres. pple.: cf., for instance, 'John was digging potatoes', 'Who saw John digging potatoes?', and 'Who ever heard of John (= John's) digging potatoes?'

3. In a few ME. writers, esp. in Wyclif, the form in -inge, -ynge, also appears for the Dative Infinitive, OE. -enne, ME. -ene, -en. Thus Luke xxii. 23 'who it was of hem that was to doynge [facturus] this thing.' John vi. 72 'this was to bitraiynge [traditurus] him.' In its origin this is a case of phonetic confusion; the OE. -enne, confounded with -ende, had, like the pres. pple. (see -ING 2), passed through -inde to -inge, -ynge.

But it is possible that Wyclif, in using this form to render the L. future participle, actually identified it in sense with the gerund, understanding the first quotation above as if = 'who it was of them that was [destined] to the doing of this thing', which he contracted to the gerundial construction 'to doynge this thing'.

-ing [2], suffix of the present participle, and of adjs. thence derived, or so formed; an alteration of the original OE. -ende = OFris., OS. -and, OHG. -ant-i (-ent-i, -ont-i, MHG. -end-e, Ger. -end), ON. -and-i (Sw. -ande, Da. -ende), Goth. -and-s, -and-a, = L. -ent-, Gr. -ovτ-, Skr. -ant-.

Already, in later OE., the ppl. -ende was often weakened to -inde, and this became the regular Southern form of the ending in Early ME. From the end of the 12th c. there was a growing tendency to confuse -inde, phonetically or scribally, with -inge; this confusion is specially noticeable in MSS. written by Anglo-Norman scribes in the 13th c. The final result was the predominance of the form -inge, and its general substitution for -inde in the 14th c., although in some works, as the Kentish Ayenbite of 1340, the pple. still regularly has -inde. In Midland English -ende is frequent in Gower, and occasional in Midland writers for some time later; but the southern -inge, -ynge, -ing, favoured by Chaucer, Hoccleve, and Lydgate, soon spread over the Midland area, and became the Standard English form. The Northern dialect, on the other hand, in England and Scotland, retained the earlier ending in the form -ande, -and, strongly contrasted with the verbal sb. in -yng, -ing (-yne, -ene). At the present day the two are completely distinct in Northumberland and the Southern Counties of Scotland, although the general mutescence of final d, and the change of -ŋ to -in, make the difference in most cases only a vowel one: e.g. 'a singan' burd', 'the singin (-in) o' the burds', but 'a gaan hairn' (a going child), 'afore gangin' hame'.

As -inge was the proper ending of the vbl. sb. (-ING [1]), it has naturally suggested itself to many that the levelling of the pres. pple. under the same form must have been the result of some contact or confusion of the functions or constructions of the two formations. But investigation has discovered no trace of any such functional or constructional contact in Early ME.; and it is now generally agreed that the confusion was, in its origin, entirely phonetic. On the other hand, the fact that the forms had, by the 14th c., become identical, may have been a factor in the development of the gerundial use of the vbl. sb., which began then; and it has certainly influenced the subsequent development of the compound gerundial forms being made, having made, having been made, being about to go, etc., which have the same form as the corresponding participles (see -ING [1] 2). The identity of form of pr. pple. and gerund probably also assisted the process whereby, at a later date, such a construction as 'the king went a-hunting', formerly 'on or an huntinge', was shortened to 'the king went hunting', the last word being then taken as the participle; and thus to the shortening of 'the ark was a-building', orig. 'on building', to 'the ark was building',—in which, if 'building' is taken as a pple., it must be explained as a pple. passive = being built. To the same cause must be ascribed some of the current constructions of the gerund, and the tendency of the vbl. sb. when used attributively to run together with the pr. pple. used adjectivally, as in cutting tools, a driving wheel (see -ING [1]).

The termination -ing is that of the pres. pple., whether used as part of the verb, or adjectivally; also of adjectives of participial origin or nature, as cunning, willing, daring, buccaneering, freebooting, non-juring, hulking, lumping, strapping, swingeing, and of prepositions or adverbs of participial origin, as concerning, during, excepting, notwithstanding, pending, touching.

As with the vbl. sb. (-ING [1]), words of participial form and use may be formed on other parts of speech, or on phrases, e. g. buccaneering adventurers, sailors yo-hoing lustily, how-d'ye-doing acquaintances.

-ing [3], a suffix forming derivative masculine sbs., with the sense of 'one belonging to' or 'of the kind of', hence 'one possessed of the quality of', and also as a patronymic = 'one descended from, a son of', and as a diminutive. Found in the same form, or as -ing, in the other Teutonic langs. OE. examples are æpeling ATHELING, cyning KING, lytling little one, child, flýming fugitive, hóring whoremonger; also the patronymics Æpelcnúlfing son of Æthelwulf, Ecgbrehting, Cerdicing, Wodening, etc. (OE. Chron. anno 855), Adaming, etc. (Lindisf. Gosp. Luke iii. 38), and the gentile names Hoccingas, Iclingas, Centingas (men of Kent), with the Scriptural Gomorringas, Moabitingas, Idumingas, etc. This suffix also formed names of coins, as pending, penning PENNY, scilling SHILLING, and of fractional parts, as feorþing quarter, FARTHING, teoðung, -ing tenth, TITHING: so ON. þriðjung-r third part, thriding RIDING (of Yorkshire).

Among words of various ages with this suffix are bretheling, hunting, gelding, golding, herring, hilding, sweeting, whiting, wilding. See also the compound suffix -LING (-l + -ing).

Ingot (i·ngɒt). Also 4–6 yngot. [Of uncertain origin. Occurs in Chaucer in sense 1; then not till the second half of the 16th c. in sense 2 (though sense 1 is also used in 16–18th c.). [Note. F. lingot is held by some French etymologists to be adopted from Eng., with coalescence of the article, for l'ingot. The origin of a term of alchemy (as this evidently was) in Eng., is not a priori probable. Also, the only recorded sense of F. lingot (which appears frequently in 15th–16th c.) is=our sense 2, while the English ingot before 1538 is known only from Chaucer in sense 1: this makes a difficulty, unless it is assumed that sense 2 was also in English during these two centuries, though not yet found. Those who assume an Eng. origin suggest a derivation (not unapt as regards the sense) from in adv., and goten, ancient pa. pple. of OE. gēotan, ME. ȝeoten, ȝeten, yheten, mod. dial. yett to pour, to cast (metal). Here there is the difficulty that the pa. pple. goten was conformed to the rest of the vb., as ȝoten, yhoten, yoten, before the 14th c.; the hard g might perh. have been retained in an old compound, as in the derivative gote, 'water-course, gutter, drain', but even in that case we should have expected an original final vowel, giving ME. ingote. The existing evidence is thus too contradictory for any certain conclusion.]
